

Education 340 Reading in the Secondary School

Patricia Gross, Associate Professor
Department of Education

The 26 students in the Spring 2005 course EDU 340 Reading in the Secondary Schools explored general information sources (Standard I) and applied the new information in a variety

History students:

"The annotated bibliography forced me to look at different types of books and sources that I normally wouldn't — videos, tapes of speeches, poetry."

"The multicultural assignment gave the idea and the concept of using all sorts of information. It can provide for different types of reading comprehension from sources and provides information to students. It also allows students to be involved in research and formulate different ways to take in information..."

"I found this assignment valuable in my progression because I realized sometimes in the classroom students need to investigate outside the textbook."

English students:

"The concept of using a variety of sources is something I could instill in my students because many students do not recognize the variety of sources available to them."

"The annotated bibliography helped show the variety of resources available for students. While I researched, I came across interviews, videos, etc., which were much more interesting than just reading texts."
